REMARKS SEIZED HER

Agony of Handsome Maria St. Clair in the Dock.

RUM'S WORK ON A WOMAN

The Judge Used Becky Smith as a Horrible Example for the Young Prisoner—She Promised to Reform and Was Released—Strong Case Against Clara Wallace.

"Doorway, doorway!" yelled Flynn in the policecourt this morning until he grew as hoarse as a steam whistle. The corridor was packed to suffocation with a crowd of men and women, who persisted in hanging around the entrance to the courtroom.

"Now, what do you want, eh?" cried the big policeman to a fat colored man, and a little dried-up yellow woman, both of them with their eyes glued to the cracks between the swinging doors.

"I'm waiting for my man," Clara cried, said the woman, reluctantly, turning her head away.

"Clara, who?" asked Mike, quickly.

"Wallace," answered the man, "dub-bler-a-l-a-e-e," he added, spelling it out slowly.

Flynn jumped around in a perfect paroxysm of delight. "So it's Clara, so it is," he chuckled. "Well, wait in and see if you get sourced for I arrested her meself, an' the prosecuting attorney appears as a witness against her."

SHE DID NOT ESCAPE.

"Good heavens," stammered the man, "dat gal is gone sho'. Wid de whole cot'er per-son on her, how kin she escape?"

And Clara didn't. Her fine was a heavy one, because of her unusually vicious conduct.

Yesterday afternoon she stood in front of Driscoll's saloon, on Seventh street, and threw bricks through the windows until the front of the place looked as if it had been struck by a cyclone.

Mike Flynn, who lives in the neighborhood, heard the uproar and reached the saloon as Clara was flinging her seventh brick. Mr. Pugh happened to be passing, and he and Mike appeared against the girl.

This girl acted in a very disorderly manner, your honor," he said, "and as it is a particularly aggravated case I think a heavy fine should be imposed. She was smashing the windows of a saloon and wrecked a pane of glass in the window."

Mike stood by muttering, "A Mr. Pugh's testimony with exculpatory notes of his head."

"Ten dollars fine," said his honor.

Clara refused to pay a word for her defense, and as she passed back her two friends walked out sorrowfully.

Julia Stewart lives in Pleasant alley with her worthless husband and two children. She works out at the washstand, and has a room at home the best part of the day. When Julia came home Saturday night she found her worst half and three other men seated at the table in the kitchen, playing poker.

Julia ordered them out, and they went, which made Stewart mad, and he banged her around lively. Julia screamed and swore, while the brute pounded her on the breast.

Policeman Mullen heard the cries and locked Julia up, while the husband remained home and slept comfortably in a bed. As for poor Julia she tossed around on the hard bench of a cell all night, thinking of her baby.

She had the court's sympathy this morning when she told her story.

Julia said she never swore, but did scream when her husband struck her.

"All her little brother," sobbed Julia, a clean, respectable-looking middle-aged woman.

"Never been arrested before?" asked the judge.

"No, I didn't," said Julia.

"No, you didn't," said the judge.

"You don't look like a drinking woman," remarked the court, "I am going to take your personal bonds, and try in future to keep peace in the house," said the judge.

Julia thanked the court profusely, and hurried away to her children.

THE JUDGE'S LECTURE.

The case of Maria St. Clair, a young and handsome white woman, furnished an opportunity for Judge Kimball to deliver a strong, pointed lecture on the evils of drinking.

Policeman Yoe had the defendant charged with disorderly conduct. Yoe said that at 1 o'clock Sunday morning he heard bells and cries, mixed with oaths and obscene language coming from a shoemaker's shop in the basement of a house on Fifteenth street northwest.

He entered the squalid place and saw to his astonishment a pretty woman, as lightly clad as Tilly in the "Altogether," who was beating the air and did not realize the condition she was in.

Yoe persuaded her to put on her clothes and carried Maria to the station, where she gave several names at last her real one—St. Clair. There was not a trace of dissipation on her face when she tremblingly faced the court and pleaded ignorance of her offense.

The court, whose eyes were clear and inquisitive, her lips were curved like a scarlet bow and her complexion was pink and white as a baby's. She had dressed her dark, curling hair carefully, and her hands, resting on the solid rail, were white and shapely.

Policeman Yoe told of the defendant's actions and the condition he found her in.

Judge Kimball questioned about the woman's scarcity of garments, and Yoe said she wore nothing but a single garment when he found her. His honor had a fine shade of disgust on his face as he asked the woman if she had any statement to make.

Her dark eyes filled, her lip quivered and her small hands clenched as she made a plea for mercy and liberty.

"Indeed I don't remember, judge, of being undressed," she said. "I am not a bad girl, but I will acknowledge I had been drinking. It is my one sin."

"Yes, and a sin," replied the court, "that is responsible for many others."

"You are going down the hill fast, my girl," continued the judge, impressively.

THE WARNING.

"If you could see some of the women who came here from ruin it would make you shudder. You don't show the effects of drink now," and his honor stared at the handsome creature so near the quick-sands of destruction, "but you will. If you keep at it you will lose all your beauty and become a wretched, sodden hag like many before you as I have seen as you go by."

The woman turned uneasily in the stand, and her eyes, roving over the dock, fell on a woman sitting in an corner of the pen, chewing snuff and munching her wicked old mouth at the ear of a negro with whom she seemed half-fellowed and half-lover. She was Becky Smith, an inmate of the workhouse since the memory of the oldest official around the court. For a few seconds the eyes of the two women met.

Becky grinned and sneered, revealing her horrible blackened, broken teeth, and wrinkling her face into a devilish grimace in her delight at the young woman's embarrassment.

Maria faced the court again. Judge Kimball had noticed the by-play, and was quick to take advantage of it.

"You see," he said, gently, as the prisoner bowed her head, crying hopelessly, "what whisky can do. Now stop and tell me: will you promise never to take another drink?"

"Oh, my God, yes," she answered, beating her hands together wildly; "never, never again! I have sworn, but if you don't mind me, I shall lose it, and then I am lost."

"That word 'lost' rang through the courtroom and touched her heart."

"No one is lost at your age," he replied. "You have got time to save yourself. Leave the old life behind you and start life again."

The judge warned her never to come before him again and released her.

ARRESTED A WIDOW.

The next prisoner was also a white woman who had been locked up since Saturday night. She was Mrs. Foster, a widow, and was arrested by Policeman J. P. O'Day for being disorderly.

O'Day said she was in Kozel's summer garden, on Fourteenth street, under the influence of liquor, and was put out.

"When I ordered her to move on," said O'Day, "she cursed me, so I locked her up."

"Use the name of the Deity," inquired the court.

"Yes, sir; several times," replied the policeman.

The defendant, terrified out of her wits by her surroundings, for it was her first appearance in the police court, denied O'Day's story. She was a shabbily dressed, worn-out female, with her face showing the pinch of poverty and privation.

"I was looking for a friend, your honor," she said, bravely trying to keep the tears back, "who promised to meet me in the garden. I am a hard working woman and have a sick baby home."

"Have you ever been arrested before?" asked the judge.

"Indeed I haven't," said the woman.

"Did you curse the officer?" asked the judge.

"No, sir," said the woman.

"Case dismissed," said his honor. "Go home to your baby."

John Winnick and Daniel Whelan were both charged with disorderly conduct. The latter, who wore tremendous black-rimmed eye-glasses, and had an incessant flow of language.

"What do you take his pitcher for?" queried the judge.

"Your honor," said Winnick, "I have not been locked up."

"Come down to the case," said the court.

"I've got it back to him again. He picked up a brick, then, and threatened to hit me with it."

"Look here, judge," said the voluble Winnick. "I don't think that's fair. I'm an old man of sixty-five, and this fellow is a young, vigorous man. As good natured as your honor is, if a man attacked you like he did me, you'd have to defend yourself some way."

Judge Kimball thought for a moment and reduced the fine in Winnick's case to $2.

Whelan went down.

Shot by Her Lover.

Chesley, Mich., June 1.—Emma Morrell was shot and killed last night by her fiancé, Fred Hyloff, who was in a jealous rage because the young woman had been secured home by another man. Hyloff then shot himself, and not accounting for his wound, he tried to kill himself with a second shot, but he was finally controlled and arrested.
